The apparatus is of the greatest simplicity and neatness; the light therefrom, on account of its position, surpasses all others, and, if the size and number of burners be properly considered, it is not expensive. A further recommendation is that it ventilates in an admirable manner the building where placed. An error often committed in fixing these lights is to place them too high up; indeed, in some cases, the tube is dispensed with, the reflector being attached to the ceiling. This increases materially the cost of gas, inasmuch as the light is diminished very sensibly, in proportion to the increased distance of the flames illuminating. Therefore they should always be placed as low as consistent with general appearance, taking care that the reflector does not cast a shade on the persons assembled in the galleries or upper part...
