Excerpt: . . . Dedicatory Address of Major James A. Connolly. More than a third of a century has passed since we first stood on this fatefuP field. Then its hills and valleys, its open plain and dark forest aisles echoed andF. rang with the fierce clangor of war between roa. ooo Anglo-Saxons, who contended with all their native courage for the mastery, and none of whom would admit defeat when the end came and the hush of peace fell on the field. In this lapse of years all the arms have been stacked--one of the banners has been folded--all the combatants have become brothers and those who fought each other the best, claim, today, the strongest ties of kinship, , for all have come to knowthat true soldierly valor is not marred by the blazonry of the banner under which it appeared--War is not an unmixed evil. It enabled the men of the Revolution to erect the skeleton of a Great Republic, where men were not only to be free, but equal, before the law, where neither the accident of wealth nor of poverty should put an enduring mark upon man, where every individual should learn to rely upon himself, with full assurance that industry and capacity would meet its just reward. But the men of the Revolution could only erect the skeleton of their Republic, thus giving it general shape, form and foundation as the result of their years of heroic war, but it remained for another...
